The whole system on one page | Aussie Grad Careers

You are competing for the visible 20% of the market with everyone else who is refreshing Seek. The other 80% is filled through conversations. Everything below exists to move your effort from the first pile into the second.

The three steps, in order

1 Fix the documents

An Australian resume, written as achievements rather than duties, and a real cover letter for every application. Two pages, no photo, no marital status, Australian spelling. Modules 02 and 03, and the templates that come with them.

2 Build the system

Target the roles you meet 80% of. Track every application the day you send it. Follow up after 7 days of silence, because almost nobody else does. Modules 05 and 08, and the application tracker.

3 Have the conversations

Optimise LinkedIn so recruiters can find you, then deliberately build an Australian network: people one or two years ahead of you who share your university or your home country. Modules 04, 06 and 07.

Most people do step 1, skip step 2 entirely, and never start step 3. Then they conclude the market is closed to them. The order matters: good documents sent randomly is still a random job search.

The numbers

25 a week	Quality, tailored applications. Five a day, five days a week.
7 days	Then follow up on anything you have not heard back about.
80%	Meet 80% of the criteria and apply. Nobody meets 100%.
50 / 30 / 20	Your time: outreach and relationships, applications, recruiters.
20 to 30	Target companies whose careers pages you check weekly.
2 pages	Resume maximum. One is fine early career.

Your first week

Do these in this order

- Day 1 Watch module 02 and rewrite your resume using the template. Do not skip the professional summary: three of the six seconds a recruiter spends land there.
- Day 2 Rewrite your LinkedIn headline to the job title you want plus two tools and your city. Fill in the About section, four paragraphs. Turn Open to Work on.
- Day 3 Open the application tracker. Build your list of 20 to 30 target companies, bookmark each careers page, set a Google alert for each company name plus the word hiring.
- Day 4 Set up saved searches with daily alerts on Seek and LinkedIn. Send your first five applications, highest match first, and log every one.
- Day 5 Send five connection notes to people one or two years ahead of you at your target companies. Lead with what you share, ask for nothing.
- Day 6 Write one cover letter properly, using the template, for the role you most want. Time yourself so you learn what it actually costs.
- Day 7 Rest. This is a long process and burning out in week two helps nobody.

What comes with this

Application tracker	.xlsx	Logs every application, works out the 7 day follow-up date, and counts you against 25 a week. Has tabs for target companies and networking too.
Resume template	.docx	Every field has guidance in it, not blank brackets.
Resume before and after	.pdf	The same resume fixed, annotated, so you can see what changed and why.
Cover letter template	.docx	Five paragraph structure plus a full worked example.
Selection criteria worksheet	.docx	STAR, with one criterion answered at proper length so you can see how long is long enough.
Follow-up email swipe file	.docx	The three emails, word for word.
LinkedIn and networking packs	.docx	The message sequences, and who to send them to.
Interview scripts	.docx	The question bank, the four stories, and the visa answer.

Every one of these is complete. Nothing has been held back to make a paid version look better, because that would be a strange way to treat people who have already been messed around enough. What JobHub removes is time: the retyping, the follow-up dates, the counting, the company research you do twenty five times a week. The method is identical and it is all in these files.

Upload your resume and it will tell you, specifically, what an Australian recruiter would flag. It costs nothing and takes two minutes.
